JUDGE MESICK.

Something of His Life and Character.

The death of Judge Mesick adds to the roll of dead Sagebrushers, one of the brainiest men this State ever knew. Although for many years past he has resided in San Francisco, his long residence in this State, made him a true Nevadan.

As a jurist he certainly never had a superior on the Coast. He did not depend on brilliant rhetoric and garish eloquence for his success. He made an exhaustive study of his case, laid up his ammunition in his office, and when he reached the court room he laid down the law to his opponents cold and merciless, and poured the points and authorities into the enemy with the precision of a Gatling gun.

He once said to the writer: "Many lawyers complicate a simple case to make their clients think that the case is so complicated that they ought to have a big fee. The real way a lawyer should do is to take a complicated case and simplify it."

It was a treat to sit down quietly with Mesick and hear him talk. He had a profound wisdom and a rare humor, and when he was in his happy moods, no more charming conversationalist ever lived. He had the best authors by heart, for he knew literature as he knew the law, and all the wise and witty sayings of the men who wielded wise or witty pens from Greece to America, he had stored up in his retentive brain, and we never heard a lecture from any platform half so brilliant or instructive as two hours spent in listening to old Mesick.

He always lived like a prince, for he has earned the highest fees of any lawyer on the Coast, and spent his money like water.

He liked a good time and all that it implies. He never concealed anything he did; he was open and above board, and in the palmy days of the Comstock "Mesick's thousand dollar bats" were proverbial.

He had a queer habit of indulging in these terrible sprees just before his big cases were called. He insisted that after he had spent several weeks in hard study of a case, his brain became so weary that he found it necessary to go on a twenty-four hour spree to rest his brain and clear it.

His clients soon learned that there was method in this.

After these wild swims in champagne, he would apparently be dead to the world at 11 in the morning, and at 1 he would rise in court just as if he had stepped out of a bandbox, with his head as clear as a bell, and begin an argument that would last for hours without break or flaw.

The writer once heard him say: "Don't scold me for drinking, gentlemen. For every hour I spend in skylarking, I spend another studying law."

When his hair whitened and his tall form was bent with years, he was still an intellectual giant, and the greatest pleader at the bar the Coast ever saw passed away when Mesick died.

His talents and generosity will ever be a pleasant memory to Nevadans.

The Call.

The San Francisco Call that has been derided for years by its lively contemporaries for its old ram-shackle press and antiquated notions, has suddenly woke up and shown a remarkable burst of speed.

It came out on Sunday with a big 60 page edition and anyone who says that the edition was not a "corner" as a special, don't know a first class thing when he sees it. It was replete with special articles, from leading writers, artistic illustrations, good both in drawing and process work and the arrangement of the whole showed a new master hand at the helm. We think common fairness would have caused the papers who have made fun of the Call, to lift their hats gracefully and say: "Put it there old fellow, you're one of us."

Turn out everybody.
